It allows users to compose and send e-mails to others using any e-mail service provider, such as Hotmail, or even from local accounts on a personal computer. Mail supports plain text, HTML text, and attachments, and allows users to exchange messages in various Internet forums and groups, such as Usenet newsgroups, public bulletin boards, and social websites. Features: Using the application is very easy, even for users that are not that familiar with the Internet. The layout of the program looks like a simplified and standard e-mail interface. You start by creating an e-mail account. You can add recipients, add different files, edit text, use templates, and send the mail in different ways. You can add new messages to a conversation, create a new conversation, delete messages, and change the layout of the messages. The new version has the possibility to organize groups with a time limit, message number limit, and a maximum file size. We use Office Outlook 2007 and the latest version of Office 2007. We would like to create "emails" that can be sent to our members and non-members without the use of attachments. We are creating them now as pdf attachments but cannot attach them to emails. I would like to be able to do this. It would save us hundreds of dollars and make our staff more efficient. The option is listed under "Attachments" or "Attachments and Other". Is it possible to set this up using the WYSIWYG editor? If so, can you provide me with instructions on how to do this please? Thanks for your time. -Eve A: Microsoft has this feature called "Email Intents". You could try looking into it. To accomplish this you would be able to set up a custom button that would "immediately" open your email client app, click on an email, and have your client open it for you.
