In recent years, there have been widespread use of compact flash cards that are standard storage media for electronic appliances such as digital cameras. Standard storage media for such compact flash cards include MMC (multimedia card) and SD (secure digital) memory cards. The storage capacity of the compact flash card is limited. When the storage capacity of the compact flash card becomes full, the contents stored therein cannot be managed. Moreover, the user may not be able to determine the full storage capacity of the compact flash card in advance. Therefore, when the storage capacity of the compact flash card has become full, the compact flash card has to be taken out of the electronic appliance and replaced with a new compact flash card to store new data. However, when the storage capacity of the compact flash card has become full, the user may not have time to remove the compact flash card from the electronic appliance and replace the compact flash card with a new compact flash card. A conventional storage device is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 7,078,822 (Jul. 18, 2006). The storage device includes a compact flash card and a socket into which the compact flash card is to be inserted. The storage device is not able to store all the contents of the compact flash card in the socket. When the storage capacity of the compact flash card has become full, the storage device needs to be taken out of the electronic appliance and
