The increased importance is due to the utilization of nucleic acid chemistry and molecular biology in many different areas of research and medical care. For example, nucleic acid chemistry and molecular biology have been used to control the expression of a desired gene and the function of proteins encoded by a gene. However, the known nucleic acid sequences are usually only a small part of the desired gene. Therefore, the success of these uses of nucleic acid chemistry and molecular biology depends on the development of a technique for easily screening nucleic acids to determine which nucleic acids are desired. There are several techniques for screening nucleic acids. For example, one way to screen nucleic acids is to use a hybridization technique. In a hybridization technique, nucleic acids are attached to a solid support. The solid support is
