[Re: Just passed a Honda in the last week or so. It's a 2009 Civic EX with the navigation. If anyone wants one of those, email me.] I actually consider coding for Delphi a bit of a mistake! When you think about it, Delphi was a huge success - it was the tool of choice for tens of thousands of developers and if you asked any developer in the 1990's if they had to switch to a new language, it was probably C# or Java or something like that. And with the 1.0 release of Delphi in 1996, it had a huge impact on other IDEs. Then came the 1.5 and 1.6 releases and to me the signs started showing that there was no real passion behind the product and Delphi was just taking up space. Delphi was great for beginners and the 1.1 release of Borland's Object Pascal was the best introduction to programming for that era. But then came Delphi 2 and the rest is history. Delphi was an amazing product back in the day. The early version of the IDE was easy to use, had a fast compiler, and had a really great debugger. I still use Delphi to this day - it's my go to language for new projects. But I would hate to see Delphi just fade away. The product is still going strong, there are still plenty of options for Delphi in the free and open source world. It's still used by thousands of developers every day. So if you have any passion for Delphi, if you love working in it, if you want to help keep the product going, and you just love programming in a procedural, object-oriented language, you should join the Delphi team. jfdlsjsljdldpld
