With regards to selling, proprioritate pentru proiecte la ei ne povestesc ca inainte de comandarea lucrarilor se ofera optiunea... A: There are two distinct questions here. a) How do I define a software contract? This is a question of contract law. Software contracts are contracts in this sense. If you are an expert in software contracting, you can also write a contract. You can model software contracts in your head, or in an Excel spreadsheet, or in a Word document. You can draft legal briefs or not, but you can write contracts. Any contract you write will have to be legally enforceable. If you wish your contract to be legally enforceable you will need to employ a lawyer to draft it (or to assist you in drafting it). You might want to write this in the third person (e.g. as a client might specify the terms of his contract with a lawyer), so that, in the event of a dispute, the lawyer can be assumed not to know the client's actual intentions. Otherwise, the end result of your software contracting efforts may be to create a contract that simply excludes the client and/or the company you work for from legal responsibility in most circumstances. b) how can I define a software contract that I can use in my work? This is a question of software, but you may be better placed to answer this one yourself. By the way, all software contracts are not so black and white as "a customer pays money for a product, the vendor does a delivery". What if it's an ongoing relationship? Do you have to write an entirely new document? Can a simple maintenance contract be written in a single email? (You can google "agreement template" to find some examples.) If you already have a legally binding contract, then you just need to replace the contract's terms with the relevant software contract terms. If the customer has chosen to enter into a contractual relationship with you, then you have the option of accepting or rejecting the contract and of giving a response to the customer. If your customer is not using any kind of technology (e.g. not buying a product from you), then your only
