The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of an educational intervention for weight management for young adults on rates of weight gain during the subsequent 5 years. A sample of 101 college-aged women (mean age = 22.4 years) completed a 24-month randomized, single-blind intervention study with a 2-year follow-up. Groups were assigned to (1) 15 weekly educational lessons or (2) 15 weekly educational lessons plus a pre-group counseling session. Assessments included weight, height, body mass index, percentage weight change, diet, self-esteem, and depression. BMI gain was reduced at 2-year follow-up ($d = 1.0$) and is currently the most effective strategy for weight loss in young adults. Weight gain was reduced by 44% among those in the educational intervention group. There were no significant effects on the other weight control indicators. Participants in the educational intervention group also reported significant increases in self-esteem ($d = 0.7$) and reductions in depressive symptoms ($d = 1.8$). These findings suggest that weight management programs for young adults that are theory-driven and use standardized educational materials produce a modest, yet significant reduction in weight gain over the subsequent 5 years.
