Canada's gov't recently announced it was dropping the controversial "Enbridge Line 9" pipeline project, because it was found there wasn't enough community support for it to proceed. The announcement came in the same month that the $7-billion Alberta Clipper oil sands project — which has drawn scrutiny — was given the go-ahead in British Columbia. The Alberta project has sparked strong opposition due to its potential risks for caribou and First Nations' sacred burial grounds. The opposition in Canada to the tar sands industry and its infrastructure was strong, strong enough to get the government of then-prime minister Stephen Harper to cancel its approval of the Enbridge project in 2011 — but the government then decided that the two projects couldn't be stopped at once. Enbridge Line 9's southern portion already operates, but now the company will have to start building another portion. They'll have to start from scratch, but their existing portion has been operating for nearly 20 years and will have to be completed first. The company is still expected to complete the project in 2017. The Line 9 project has also been attacked by environmentalists who say it can pollute sensitive ecosystems with oil from Alberta's tar sands and that the megaproject will also emit huge amounts of greenhouse gases into the atmosphere. The tar sands industry has been forced to deal with opposition ever since Canada approved Enbridge's Northern Gateway pipeline in 2011. But Line 9 has a different route than Northern Gateway — and one that's nearly 3,000 kilometres shorter, which has played a role in why the government decided to stop it. The project still has plenty of support in the province, and the government has been criticized for bowing to public opposition.
