One Piece Saving Ace Full Movie Tagalog Version Dance Crack For WindowsQ: How to integrate a FORTRAN program using java Hello everyone I am working in a project to integrate my fortran compiler program with java. The way I understand it is that you have a callable object that you can pass an object to in java. The problem that I am running into is that once I pass the object to the callable object in java it is no longer a valid class that I can manipulate. I dont want to change the format of the object as it will then need to be converted back to the A: What you can do is create an interface or an abstract class that all your java objects will implement. This interface will have some methods that will be implemented by every object. `public abstract ClassA { //interface methods implemented by every object. public void doSomething(); public void doSomethingElse(); public void doSomethingWithTheOtherObject(); }` Any java class that implements this interface can then call methods defined in this interface. A: If the two languages use the same object model, there is no reason why the original program needs to be re-written in Java. Just have some method in your Java class that makes an interface call to the Fortran object, passing along arguments and making sure all parameters are correctly set. And you don't have to have any special knowledge of the Fortran object; you can call it as though it was any other function.
