DBA/2J mice are frequently used as a model of salt-sensitive hypertension, but the direct contribution of altered renal function to the etiology of hypertension is not entirely clear. We used the patch clamp technique to examine the function of cells of the renal microcirculation and interstitium of DBA/2J and control C57Bl/6J mice. We compared the interstitial cells of the proximal convoluted tubule and the ascending limb of Henle's loop, and the thick ascending limb of the loop of Henle, in terms of transcellular permeability and Na(+) reabsorption. Transcellular permeability to K(+) was 40% greater and Na(+) reabsorption was 27% greater in the interstitium of DBA/2J than control mice. We confirmed these results with an in vitro perfusion technique, and with scanning ion-sensitive electrode measurements of interstitial K(+) and Na(+) concentrations. Thus, interstitial cells of the proximal convoluted tubule and ascending limb of Henle's loop of DBA/2J mice have a greater permeability to K(+) and Na(+) compared with control mice. These results suggest that the greater reabsorption of Na(+) and K(+) in the interstitium may contribute to the augmented blood pressure in DBA/2J mice.The Internet and its growing role in maintaining patient privacy and access to care. Many clinical trials of potential therapies have recently occurred or are being planned, in large part due to cost constraints imposed by newer therapies that are more costly and there is the promise of less morbidity, side effects, and higher efficacy. Despite the higher cost of some therapies, their outcomes might be less expensive than current standards of care. We might assume that only patients who are willing to pay for a higher degree of privacy and access will be enrolled in such trials 595f342e71
