Seaway coupler work may result in delays... Sign up for our special edition newsletter to get a daily update on the coronavirus pandemic. A project to link the New York and New Jersey seaports in a new way to deal with the coronavirus pandemic created even more headaches than was originally thought, as the US Coast Guard determined that the work had to be delayed. The Rebuild by Boring project was finally able to be officially announced on Monday, just after the crisis had overshadowed the event, but there's still no timetable for when it will begin. If complete, the project would place in the Hudson River a long section of tunnel suspended above the harbour, to be used to hold tubes containing a floodable compressed air reservoir used to store contaminated seeping water, and a similar tunnel below the harbour. Also under construction is a massive ship-to-shore concrete wave wall in the Hudson that will spill and dissipate waves into the stream, protecting barge workers on the famous George Washington Bridge and the US Coast Guard, who would be standing on land. The "3D Light-in-Motion and Adaptive Barge Extension to the Hudson River Intersection Project," as it is referred to in government documents, was originally scheduled to begin in late April, but had its launch delayed until May at the earliest, due to the pandemic. "The outbreak of COVID-19 has created new complexities to the delivery of the project, and as such, the Port Authority and the construction agency working on the project have decided to suspend the opening until the completion of the phase by July 31," the Coast Guard said in a statement. The New York and New Jersey ports face
