Influence of tyramine and L-norepinephrine on cortical EEG activity in cats. Studies of brain electrical activity in cats show that both tyramine and L-norepinephrine elicit a strong activation of neocortical cells. These effects are so strong that they can easily mask any effect due to direct application of these amines to brain structures. In the present work we have attempted to dissociate the effects due to the direct effects of tyramine on neocortical cells from those due to the more general effects of these amines. We carried out two series of experiments in which we directly applied either tyramine, norepinephrine, dopamine or acetylcholine to a large number of cells. With these drugs we observed a clear activation of all cells regardless of their location in the cortex. The effects are particularly intense when the drugs are applied to the striatum.
