Differential diagnosis and management of angina pectoris in the elderly. In many cases, classical ischemic heart disease can be successfully treated in the elderly.

However, elderly patients with coronary artery disease can be at increased risk for adverse outcomes. Because of a greater prevalence of risk factors, advanced disease, comorbid conditions, and greater variability in response to medical therapy, the treatment of elderly patients should be individualized. This review highlights some of the clinical issues in the elderly with ischemic heart disease, with an emphasis on the evaluation and therapy for patients with stable angina.
