How does it work? Photoshop is mostly used in ways that mimic the way photographic images are processed in the eyes of the human brain. It's easier to explain how this works by looking at Photoshop in a very basic way. Read more: Photoshop: 10 things you didn't know about the world's most popular image editing software The basic element of Photoshop is the pixel. An image is a series of pixels arranged in order of luminance, red, green and blue. An image without this format would look like a square block of pixels. This sequence of pixels is how we see images on a screen. When a pixel is turned on or off, it creates a contrasting edge or boundary on a square. It's called grayscale since there are no true colors. You can create all sorts of digital images with Photoshop. On the beginning of a project, a general idea is established; then a plan is created with Photoshop's selection tools. The image is then divided into layers; a mask is applied to the layer and the areas that do not want to be kept are turned off; and finally, the image is edited. You may have seen the phrase "corrective" or "precision" masking in Photoshop — this is when the edges and colours are further refined by closely looking at the masking shape. In order to reduce an object on a photo, the object that is selected is turned off using a selection tool. The image is then reflowed to remove the border or shape that is selected. This step is called demarcation, and it is important to get this right to avoid losing detail when retouching the image. Masks that cover a part of the image are very helpful in working with colour in order to create more accurate versions of the original photo. If you try to use a bright colour in a layer of the original image, it would likely spill over into the image. A mask is used to outline the image and prevent the colour from spilling outside the mask. These functions are very useful in creating digital images and are used in a variety of ways. Layering in Photoshop When Photoshop is layered, each layer is turned on or off using a mask. When the image is turned off in a layer, the pixels of that layer are not visible in

Oxnroid growth! 0 Long time no post. So been living with the nano tanks for a year and a half and over the past 6 months has been getting some oxanroid growth (1+/2+ inch)!! I know I have been on the cleaner and did a HEAVY water change on the 19th of June. I added a Royal Oxnroid and 2 large Anubias and a few large Algae. I cleaned out the substrate and did a water change to try to clear the waste. I just got 2 more Oxnroids today (2 more). I'm thinking of going back to a sponge and rock for the planted tank as I'm not sure what to do with the ferts of the plants... Do I need to do anything to try to slow the growth of the Oxnroid?? I'm very hesitant to replant as it's my first Tank. I'll do a water change tonight and hopefully these 2 will get some growth. I'm thinking of changing the water to be more Ph buff as it is currently 5.4 and the tank I purchased came with 3D Ph. Once I've had a water change done can I change the Ph back to it's current Ph or do I need to add other Ph to the tank? Thanks. I will do some water changes tonight and will post what I think about the Ph in the morning. wow this is pretty late for an update. I see you decided to go back to salt for your test phase which is good. Where are you at with your new idea? Additions? so far, there has not been one oxanroid invader in the test tank. I think the ph levels are fine. Adding one or two more oxanroids should not be a problem. I recommend you use only a sponge filter if possible. It will draw oxygen into your aquarium and produce cleaner water. A sponge is self cleaning and a sponge filter will remove nitrates and phosphates and other things that can be harmful to oxanroids

Didn't notice the Disney-MGM Studios theme park in Florida existed? I'm sure there was an obvious solution: Disney just doesn't watch that other one. No, wait. It must be Florida. In the meantime, why not check out one of the best Disney theme parks for kids? Disney's Animal Kingdom is officially home to the longest rope-drawn street in the world: Dinosaur! But, seriously, Dinosaur is a pretty cool place. The indoor caves are full of interactive exhibits. The Tree of Life is the most diverse of all of the 'lands' at the park. The actual Discovery Island is our pick for a great kid's park but we're happy to know that Dinosaur is a pretty nice area to hang out.
