The mechanism for the moderate, long-term, selective increase of cellular incorporation of ¹³C-labeled valine in the heart of the rat fed a low-protein diet. We have studied the cellular distribution of ¹³C-labeled valine and its incorporation into various amino acids in the heart of rats fed for 4 to 8 weeks on a diet which provided low (12.5%, wt/wt) protein or a control (21%, wt/wt) protein diet. Rats fed the low-protein diet exhibited a moderate, steady, and selective increase in the incorporation of valine into myocardial protein. The amino acids that became enriched in cardiac protein were lysine, 3-methylhistidine, methionine, and isoleucine, indicating a partial depletion of the pool of the non-essential amino acids. The incorporation of valine, however, was not affected by the low protein diet, resulting in a steady enrichment of the total heart amino acid pool. Under fasted conditions valine- and methionine-specific activity was approximately 2-fold higher in the heart of the rats fed the low-protein diet than in control rats. The methionine, but not the valine enrichments were increased in the pool of free amino acids in the heart and plasma of the animals on the low-protein diet.

The difference between the rates of valine incorporation into protein and valine oxidation in the heart was also increased in rats on the low-protein diet. The evidence obtained indicates that the long-term moderate elevation of cardiac protein synthesis in rats fed a low-protein diet, which is observed even in the absence of increased oxidation, results partly from a moderate, but more stable, increase in valine-specific protein synthesis. (MySpace) According to a new report from the industry research company comScore, MySpace.com has been pushing hard to go mobile. The site has launched a new mobile app called MySpace Now that comes with access to user profiles and mobile-only music listening functions. The report notes that "MySpace Now already has more than 1.5 million users, but it's yet to attract widespread usage."
