The next goal of this proposal is to understand some of the underlying mechanisms of this phenotype. An overview of the current understanding of tumor cell bioenergetics is presented and a new testable hypothesis of the cancer phenotype is proposed. The new hypothesis is based on recent observations of NAD-dependent lactate dehydrogenase (LDH) catalyzed reduction of oxygen in intact tumor cells. Earlier data suggested that LDH catalyzed reduction of oxygen was dependent on the presence of an equimolar concentration of lactate. We have observed that this is not the case. We propose that the LDH of tumor cells is essential for the tumor phenotype. In support of this hypothesis, we have developed experimental evidence that the LDH of tumor cells is cancer-associated and present in the cytosol. Most interestingly, we observed that the LDH of tumor cells is more sensitive to inhibition by pyruvate than the LDH of liver cells. Hence, the LDH of tumor cells is more efficient in catalyzing the reduction of oxygen in the presence of lactate. We propose that this increased efficiency is caused by a higher affinity of LDH for pyruvate in tumor cells than in non-tumor cells. We hypothesize that tumor LDH is more efficient in catalyzing the reduction of oxygen in the presence of lactate because of its
