If you've got a vehicle with a standard 12-volt battery, you probably haven't seen such a specific twelve-volt automotive battery charger in a while. This automotive battery charger is especially designed for 12-volt storage batteries with deep cycle characteristics. A 12 volt battery that is flat (completely discharged) is standard with most early types of cars. To recharge, the battery is either plugged into a vehicle wall socket or the car's 12-volt electrical system is connected to a 12-volt charger. Later on, many 12-volt batteries will have a separate recharging circuit/housing that can be added to the 12-volt battery. The vehicle's 12-volt electrical system is not reliable for charging a 12-volt battery, so a separate battery charger is normally provided. When the car is plugged into a wall socket or the car is connected to a 12-volt charger, a 12-volt battery charger will automatically begin charging a 12-volt battery. The 12-volt battery charger remains connected to the battery while the battery is being recharged. Upon completion of the recharge, the 12-volt battery charger will cut the battery off from the source of 12-volQ: Entity Framework 6.1.3 "Repository" pattern with Dependency Injection? I'm trying to use the repository pattern using the repository pattern with dependency injection. I have a method that returns an object called ContactRepository which should use a ContactService to retrieve a Contact object. The DI's are working fine, and I can see the ContactService bean being injected into the ContactRepository. However, the ContactRepository class creates a new instance of the ContactService which is definitely not the behaviour I'm expecting. I'm probably missing something, and I need a push in the right direction. My example code: public class ServiceManager { private readonly ContactService _contactService; public ServiceManager(ContactService contactService) { _contactService = contactService; } public ContactRepository CreateRepo() { return new ContactRepository(_contactService); } } public class ContactRepository : I
