January 29, 2012 Is there really a Big 12 Power Rankings Debate? A recent Associated Press poll revealed the SEC and Big 12 have some of the most improved offenses heading into 2012 with SEC playing catch-up to the Big 12. While this might make the Big 12 sound like a power conference, the difference in average bowl game seedings between the two conferences is so great that it is really not even close. And we know about the SEC playing catch-up, they are very good at that. What is interesting about the Big 12's postseason success is that their bowl success is not predicated solely on their dominance at the end of the season. In the past, despite a lack of any dominant victories, the best the Big 12 has done in bowl play is come home with a win. There is some evidence that they are more likely to pull off one of those now, but this year is very different. This year their bowl wins are much more likely to come during the regular season than from the season's end. In the past two seasons, Big 12 and Pac-12 teams have won at least 10 games, but failed to reach the postseason. The Big 12 finished 9-4 and the Pac-12 finished 7-7. Now, these seasons stand as signs that the projections were premature. The Pac-12 has made an improvement to their bowl appearances. The Big 12, however, has not. Thanks to the AP's Final Four projections, we have the chance to see a similar trend continue in 2012. Not only will the Big 12 finish with a better bowl record, they will also surpass the Pac-12 in bowl game probability. The median for the Big 12 to reach 8.5 wins was at 47.4% with an average over-under of 7.9 wins. The median for the Pac-12 to reach 9 wins was at 40.2% with an average over-under of 8.7 wins. Based on these figures, the Big 12 will reach 8.5 wins
