When you zoom out beyond 100% on a photo, it's saved to your hard drive at 100% without any quality reduction. To get back to the 100% you saved at, have another look at the Fit page. Take a look at this image zoomed way out beyond its natural size. If you try to enlarge the 200% version, you see that the quality has deteriorated. However, the 300% version is still fine. It should be noted that this option is only available for TIFFs when you save a file from Lightroom 5. When saving a JPEG or a PDF, the default is that the image is output at whatever the natural size is. If the image is too large, you will see extra space at the margins on the page. Adobe also adds the option to save a file at 100% or 200% at the time of saving the file. The reason for this is because the file may not be suitable for such a high resolution to the file size, so the source data remains untouched. This option is available for all other file types in Lightroom 5. A couple of other brand-new features in Lightroom 5 offer better bulk operations and more visual effects. The One-Click Edit feature is the Beginning/End Transition tool. You just select the beginning and/or ending point that you want to work on and then select the Image Processor tool and choose an effect from the menus to apply to the transition. The same thing doesn't apply to images. Click on the Image Processor tool here and choose Enhance from the menu. You can use this to apply gradients, lighting, and color effects and now there are options to fix white balance, black and white, red eye, and defocus among others. The Color Look Up feature shows how to manipulate color based on their hue. You can customize the types of swatches that are added and remove some of the presets. These options aren't just for catalog files. When you're working, you get an Abundance view that shows where there are duplicate files in your catalog. You can use this information to split each image into separate files (and sub-folders, if so desired). When you import photos, you'll see a little clock icon on the side of each "newly imported" file (see this image to see the icon in the Screens section). If you click on this icon, you'll see what others have done to get the best from these images for their projects – all based on your albums, keywords, collections, etc. Lightroom also starts becoming real-time with this version. When you crop or enhance photos, for example, you can watch these changes appear in real time. This is really nice when you're working with several people and you're talking about what to do with a photo.
