The cameras, chronophotographs or time-lapse cameras, designed for the photography of time-temporal series are equipped with a photocell which operates through the interaction of various photoreflectors and photocells. The high sensitivity of the photocell enables the use of red light, which does not undergo any significant change of its spectral characteristics during the cycling of the light sources (while the cyan and the near-infrared colours must be removed, otherwise their interaction with the photodetector would be too small to make a reliable picture). Each segment of time corresponding to the angular separation of the photosensitive part, is recorded in a sequence. The photocell is connected to the chronograph electric drive via a pulse generator and an electronic circuit. The electronic circuit makes it possible to adjust the quantity and number of flashes, to produce automatic or programmed sequences of pictures, and to synchronize them. James Charles gives his take on using a tanning bed, and how to have the best time getting 'completely' tanned. Dealing with all of the controversies surrounding tanning beds can be tricky. One of the most frequent questions is whether or not tanning beds damage your skin. But, then again, this is a question that applies to nearly anything, and skin-related issues are in the eye of the beholder. During a recent appearance on The Ray D'Arcy Podcast, James Charles addressed the common question: "You know, I've been using my tanning bed. But, does using a tanning bed damage your skin?" His response was reassuringly long (he's a celebrity for god's sake, so that shouldn't be surprising), and he stressed the importance of knowing the effects your tanning bed is having on your skin. "Now, I think that the main thing is to know what you're putting on your skin," James explained. "If you're using a tanning bed, you're putting a chemical on your skin. "So, yes, using a tanning bed can damage your skin. But, that's the same as saying, if you're using a moisturizer,
